To whom it may concern,

In of 2005 my son's ex-girlfriend contacted me and stated that she wanted to get in touch with my son. I let him know and they became a couple again. This girl told him at the time that her divorce would be final

With-in the month. She actually left the house to go to court for her divorce at the end of September....or so we thought. Since we had no reason not to believe her we thought she was legally divorced. She as we found out too late had not even filed for a divorce. During the time that she was with my son she became pregnant with his child. Shortly after finding out she was pregnant she claimed to have had a miscarriage. My Son and our family were very upset that the baby had died...or so we thought. She broke up with our son shortly after. To make a long story short...one night in the march of 2007 when my son was at work he received a message from this girl with a picture of a beautiful little girl saying that this is your daughter and that she had not lost her after all. The baby was seven and a half months old. After meeting with this girl and having a dna test done to confirm the paternity. Our son took them both back into his life to take care of his little girl. All the time still thinking that the baby's mother was divorced. We thought everything was great until on the first night our son went on afternoon shift at Ford. The mother moved out with the baby. We were all devastated. There was no argument..nothing..everything seemed to be great when our son left for work. When he cane home he was frantic that something had happened to the two of them. I remember getting a call at 1:30 in the morning wanting to know if something had happened. It was shortly after that we found out that she was not divorced and had not even filed. She let us see the baby until the baby could talk (this is our theory)and the visits stopped. Phone calls go unanswered. threats of calling the police if our son tries to see his daughter. Broken promises to get to see Adrionna.Our son became so depressed that I was afraid for his life because of all of this. Legally we have had no recourse because of the current

Paternity act. People should not be allowed to cheat and lie and get away with it. After she left and our son found out she was still married he told her that he would not have anything to do with her as a couple but that he always wanted to be in his daughters life. Our son even talked to husband and apologized for being involved with his wife...but that he didn't know that they were not divorced. Our son had been married years before and his ex had cheated on him...so it broke his heart that he had been part of her lie unknowingly. We love our granddaughter dearly and our son loves his daughter dearly...please I'm begging you try to change these laws so that dads can also have rights to their children.

and consideration,

Thank-you for your time
